

Cadillac Fleetwood 75 – 1957 (Sedan)

Big, bold, and built for luxury.

This magnificent Cadillac Fleetwood comes from Dallas, Texas. Its former owner worked in Garland, at the factory that produces the legendary Stetson hats—another symbol of American heritage.

Few people know that Cadillac was born from the ashes of the failed Henry Ford Company, Ford's early and unsuccessful foray into the car business. From that origin rose a brand that would become a benchmark of luxury.

By 1957, the Fleetwood 75 had become one of the most prestigious and expensive models in Cadillac's lineup. It came with electric windows, power seats, and a smooth HydraMatic automatic transmission.

Underneath, it featured a new X-frame chassis, which improved body rigidity and eliminated the need for side rails. The result? A stronger, more stable ride. And with power steering and power brakes, it delivered an effortless driving experience.

This particular Fleetwood is decorated beyond standard production—note the stainless-steel fender skirts over the rear wheels. It's currently in pre-restoration condition, patiently waiting for a new interior, a full engine overhaul, and fresh bodywork and paint.

A beautiful reminder of the golden age of American motoring—and one that will shine even brighter in the near future.
